

DUBLIN FACES STARVATION AS STRIKE RESULT

DUBLIN, Oct. 8.—After five weeks of the bitter struggle between capital and labor, Dublin's population, always on the border line of starvation, is facing acute famine conditions.

The British Miners' Federation today voted $5,000 for relief and promised $5,000 weekly while the trouble lasts. Meanwhile there is little prospect of an end of the fight, although the famous mediator, Sir George Askwith, is working hard to find a solution. Dublin employers will not decide upon his peace proposals until the end of the week. Their hitherto truculent attitude gives little promise of a settlement.

From a Bright Sunshiny Shop Come the Best Suits We Know At $18.50

We made a beaten path to the workshop of the man who is able to make better $18.50 suits than any one knew.

Then we had the suits made our way.

No trimmings to hide bad lines or workmanship. Just simple tailored styles with touches here and there to make them new.

What we took off in over-ornamentation we put on in the wear-well qualities.

Materials are the substantial all wool kind. Linings are guaranteed to wear two seasons. Coats are shaped, not stuffed. The buttons that trim them and the velvet collars and cuffs are in keeping with this quality ideal.

Suits are at all, washed, not just together, but in order. Buttons are frequently hand made. American, precisely, are given which make a suit hold its shape. The belt, the pocket flaps, the detail of covered sleeves, extra buttons and inside pockets show a nicely well worth while.

BAKER THE BIG TROUBLE-MAKER SAYS RUNYON

By DAMON RUNYON.

NEW YORK, Oct. 8.—Not as spectacular as his wallpoops of other years, perhaps, because it was finally hurried under a mass of other events, it was nevertheless the crashing blow of Franklin Baker in the opening game of the great Athletics-Giant series that carried the Athletics through. But for Baker's drive it is conceivable that the game would have been eventually decided on account of darkness, with the score a tie.

A smashing attack by the Giants of Albert Bender, the lean-fanked, saturnine Chippewa Indian—a veteran of scores of diamond wars—carried the big tow-boys close to their rivals even though

The Athletics' infield is one of the greatest ever got together. It has occasioned much argument whether it is better than the great Boston infield of Ten-

Pitchers George Wiltse and Mathewson

The break again, the Giants came in the fourth, when dashing Eddie Collins hit the first ball pitched to him for a triple to right centre.

Baker—the name runs through the entire story, an evil omen for the Giants—was the first to get on base, but he was

The giants drew first blood in the third inning, when Fred Merkle opened with a snapping roller to Jack Barry, which Barry juggled long enough for Merkle to reach safety at first.

That went down in the official records as a hit, but many spectators pushed an immediate at Doyle, and thought Barry should be credited with an error, as he would have had his man back for his brief hold.

First Run for Merkle.
Marquard laid down a sacrifice bunt and after Arthur Shafer's out on a fly to Strunk, "Lauralding Larry" Doyle hit the first ball pitched to him for a single to right, and Merkle thundered home with the first run of the game.

The Giants did more—they went beyond theirs.

The whole outlook is one of first class games to find the Athletics spend their whole spin and substance in winning the first contest. They, in fact, expected their all while the Giants had plenty of reserves.

It seems fated that "Home Run" Baker is to make a home run against the club which are some important cities. History says he has been a failure since he left the ball field with Collins at Ford. Baker landed a full hit into the main box of 1921 field grand stand for the last time and four bases.

THE BIG SHOW

The Circus-Man

In his Philosophy of Life, the venerable P. T. Barnum included this: "The people love to be humbugged."

Perhaps as a circus-man he was justified in his attitude. The people pretended to be humbugged and forgave the circus-man for his audacity. It was diversion and a matter of, say, fifty cents.

Judging by their methods, more than one of our merchants includes in his library "The Life and Philosophy of P. T. Barnum."

Pandering to cupidity and with the circus-man's audacity, they offer a twenty-five dollar suit or coat for fifteen. How, why or wherefore, doesn't matter—twenty-five for fifteen is the argument.

If the buying of a garment be to you more than a matter of diversion—if you demand of the merchant service, satisfaction and responsibility, and if you demand all the character, distinctive style and individuality with which head-and-hand can invest a garment, you will find them in SOUTHWICK Suits and Overcoats for men and young men. Boston Is Very Proud to Be the Meeting Place of the Bankers

The AMERICAN Would Remind Them That Their Country
Will Never Need Their Sincere and Self-Sacrificing Cooperation More Than It Needs It Today

Boston is very proud to be the place chosen by the bankers of the country for their national convention. We believe that Boston is an ideal place for the serious conference of serious men on serious public questions.

From the beginning of modern times the bankers the world over have been men of influence in their communities. They have risen to the highest state in all countries and have had opportunity to serve their countrymen in times of great national distress as effectively as the warriors served in the field.

This country has had its patriotic bankers in her two greatest national crises. We Americans will never forget the services of Robert Morris during our Revolutionary period and of Jay Cooke during our Civil War. These men risked their fortunes and their futures in quiet and modest sacrifice for their country's sake. The field of operation for themselves and their colleagues afforded none of the stimulants of the battlefield, "with the stir of the rolling drum" and the glory of victory. There was all sacrifice and little glory.

In this convention of bankers doubtless there are hundreds who would make the utmost sacrifice for their country. The AMERICAN devoutly hopes that no one of its distinguished visitors will forget during this conference that the country needs their self-sacrificing co-operation as much today as it will ever need it again.

We hope that every citizen of Boston will go out of his way to make the reception of these welcome guests warm and hearty and give them a good impression of the spirit of Boston and the manners of Bostonians.

The AMERICAN Congratulates
Mr. Walsh Upon His Stand at the Democratic State Convention

But Mr. Walsh Is Only One Man—Will the Party Traitors
Who Have Been Renominated Stand by Their Party Platform or Will They Violate It Again If the New Haven Railroad Sets Its Lobby to Work Again Once More?

The AMERICAN congratulates Mr. Walsh upon the role he played at the recent Democratic convention. The platform which the convention adopted was of his own making, and is one of the best the party has adopted in years. Mr. Walsh departed from precedent by reading the platform himself and moving its adoption in order that the people of the State might understand that he held himself absolutely bound by every word and every promise in it.

Mr. Walsh realized that the Democratic professions and promises are at a very large discount this year because fifty-two wretched Democratic Representatives betrayed the last Democratic platform by voting to give the New Haven Railroad the trolley lines of the western part of the State in the VERY TEETH OF THE DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM, which declared that the railroad should not own or control the street railways.

Mr. Walsh wished to make it clear that HE regarded a platform as sacred and binding. There was no better way, short of actual performance in office, than the way Mr. Walsh took, to emphasize his identity with the principles and policies adopted by the Democratic convention.

Substantially, the policies of this platform are those which were promulgated by Mr. Walsh himself when he was a candidate for the nomination before the primaries. They are sound treatments of local conditions, and if they could be enacted into law the State would be better and happier for the changes they would work.

But Mr. Walsh is only one man. The Governor's office is not all-powerful. Last year's Democratic platform was a good platform, and Governor Fox was as faithful to it as Lieutenant-Governor Walsh promises to be faithful to the present platform. But the Governor could not protect the State or the party from betrayal by a gang of miserable Democrats in the Legislature.

Some of these very party traitors have been re-nominated and may be re-elected. Have they been chastened by the contempt and opprobrium which they themselves have incurred and have brought down upon their party from the honest and intelligent citizens?

The Democratic platform declares that the Trolley Merger Bill, for which these men voted, should be revoked, and that the street railways surrendered to the New Haven Railroad should be recovered. WHAT DO THE MEN WHO HAVE BEEN RENOMINATED PROPOSE TO DO IN THIS SITUATION? WILL THEY STAND BY THEIR PARTY PLATFORM, OR WILL THEY VIOLATE IT AGAIN IF THE NEW HAVEN RAILROAD SETS ITS LOBBY TO WORK AGAIN NEXT YEAR?

The AMERICAN intends to ask these men whether they stand on the Democratic platform or stand off it. The railroad question is a cardinal issue of this campaign, and no Democratic candidate for office can differ from his party on this issue and be entitled to the support of the Democratic organization, if it is sincere, or to the support of the Democratic masses.

One Woman's Story

By VIRGINIA TERHUNE VAN DE WATER

Chapter XXXV.

MARY answered Gordon Craig's letter, writing a short and formal reply, thanking him for his sympathy and saying that she hoped his little daughter would be a great comfort to him. She did not suggest that she might ever see him again. Indeed she never allowed herself to think of this possibility. The man was dead to her.

Nor did her sentiments change when, six months later, she received a San Antonio newspaper, containing a marked notice that Gordon Craig would soon move to New York to open there a branch office in connection with his business in Texas. She was interested, to be sure, but still she told herself again that his coming East meant nothing to her. She wondered for a minute where his baby—poor motherless little—was. As Craig did not tell her that his own mother was caring for his little daughter, Mary's heart ached at the thought of the child's loss of the mother-love that had been her own portion and which her own child received in generous measure.

Her little boy continued delicate, and Mary was always anxious about him. Once she asked her physician why the boy was not strong and well.

"I give him the best care of which I am capable," he said, "and just the food that you say he should have, yet he does not gain flesh and color. What is the trouble with him?"

The doctor looked grave. "To be frank, Mrs. Fletcher," he answered, "you were overworked for months before the child came, and of course your nervous condition told upon him. But we will hope to overcome this congenital weakness and make a strong man of him yet."

Even as he spoke the physician did not feel confident of the hope he held out to the anxious mother. Yet doctors must say such things if they would keep their patients brave.

When the child was sixteen months old, Bert told Mary that he "had to go away on a three weeks' trip to the West."

"Business demands it," he said. The wife was ashamed of the wave of relief that swept over her as she appreciated what it would mean to be untried of his condition for the length of time he mentioned. She reproached herself, for she knew that if he drank when in New York, he would certainly do so out in a far-off city where there was no danger of his delinquencies being suspected by his wife or mother. Then another thought seized her.

"You will leave me with enough money to live on while you are absent, won't you, Bert?" she asked. "You know our rent is overdue, and I have no ready money in the house."

"I'll manage to pay the rent before I leave," returned her husband gruffly. "But I can't let you have any other cash. I need it for traveling expenses."

"But Bert," she reminded him, "baby and I must live. And you know I have not a cent of my own."

"You might have had some," he said brutally. "If you had not spent the little your mother lent in buying things. To be sure it was only a couple of hundred, but you could have made cheaper funeral arrangements than you did."

This speech proved to Mary Fletcher, more than anything she had ever done, to what depths of coarseness her husband had been sinking of late. She remembered his sweetening grief at her mother's death, and wondered how he could speak as he now did of the woman he had respected. Yet she did not utter any protest, but returned, after a moment, to the matter in hand. For she and the baby must live.

"What do you propose to have me do during your absence, Bert?" she asked. "I am sorry to seem so persistent, but I must plan for caring for the child."

"Don't fuss any more. There's the man. Enough to arrange all that."

Three days later Mary received a letter from her mother-in-law. Bert had told her, she wrote, of his protracted trip. While she did not approve of it, she had so far as his influence over her, what she said to him went for little. He had asked her to lend him money to leave with his wife while he was away. This she could not do. She had already lent him so much money to—she had told her—put into his business that she simply could not afford to give him any more. In fact, she herself, was living more economically than ever before and had moved into a flat smaller than the other one she had occupied, and in a very undesirable neighborhood. She had kept all this from Mary as Bert had asked her to do, but the time had come when the wife must know it. The proposal Bert's mother now had to make was that Mary and the baby come and stay with her during Bert's absence.

"The child ain't well," she wrote, "and perhaps the change would do it good. You'd better be here with me, getting your food and the child's, than out in that lonely village starving."

Mary's face flushed as she read. How could she bring herself to be an object of her mother-in-law's charity? Then she reminded herself that she was not going to town for her own sake, but for the sake of the child, and that it was also Bert's child, and his mother's grandson. What right had the wife to allow her personal pride to stand between her and what might be for the baby's good? She remembered a proverb of her husband's, and the full meaning of it came into her mind. "Needs must when the devil drives!" She no longer devalued herself by trying to see the good points in her husband's character. They were too hard to find. But she must endure for the sake of the baby. As long as he lived that would be her duty.

When Bert came home that night she told him of his mother's letter.

"Yes," he said, "ma said she'd write and ask you down. You'd better go to her, for Lord knows I haven't a cent to keep you on while I'm away. Times are harder than ever!"

Mary was not impressed by this last remark, for when her husband had been spending money recklessly, he always explained the same ready funds by declaring that times were hard or that there was "nothing doing in the business world."

The Stream of Life

By LILIAN LAUFERTY

UNKNOWINGLY, incessantly, still day by day they pass us—Those friends whom we shall never know—comrades to whom our spirit cries.

A little child may shyly smile, a gray-haired man may kindly glance; But smiling still, they pass the while, and life bears on its puppet dance.

Perhaps that girl with eyes as gray might be a comrade soul to me; That lad of spirit blithe and gay may hold to friendship's shrine the key.

But still the stream of life flows by—flows by to those uncharted seas; Comrade spirit greets the eyes, then sweeps away eternally.

With lagging step or joyful feet, at every turn throughout the day we pass, but we may never meet, still convention holds her sway. Brothers and sisters all, they claim—Perchance, but 'tis a weary while Since man has dared, unawakened, shame, to greet his fellows with a smile.

NOT LONG AGO

By WILLIAM F. KIRK

NOT long ago he was a little boy Who toddled timidly, with outstretched arms, Each passing day brought fresh parental joy And seemed to multiply his baby charms. We never dreamed that he could come to grief, His dandy and his mother loved him so. Misfortune would have seemed beyond belief Not long ago.

We see him sometimes, evil-faced and hard, Swaggering with the city's vilest men; We see him sometimes in a prison yard Wild for the drink he cannot purchase then. It seems to us that just a little rest Might come to us if we could only know His days had ended at his mother's breast Not long ago.
